THE SALES CALL CHEAT SHEET

Don't Choke On The Call

Discovery questions that find the pain, and word-for-word answers to every objection. Keep this open while you're live.

00 The mindset that closes

You're not begging for their money. You're a professional who might be able to fix a real problem they have. If you can't help them, fine, you both find out fast. That frame takes the desperation out of your voice, and desperation is what kills deals.

- Talk less than them. Aim for them talking 70-80% of the call. The more they describe their problem, the more they convince themselves they need it fixed.
- Be curious, not pushy. Your questions do the selling. A good question makes them feel the pain. A hard pitch makes them defensive.
- It's okay to disqualify. Not every business is a fit. Being willing to walk makes you more attractive, not less.

01 Discovery questions that find the pain

Spend the first chunk of the call here. Don't rush to pitch. These questions get them talking about what's broken, which is the whole point.

Warm up

- "How long have you been running [business]?"
- "How's business been lately, busy season or slow?"

Find the leak

- "How are most of your new customers finding you right now?"
- "When someone calls or messages and you're on a job, what happens to that lead?"
- "Do you ever feel like you're losing people who reach out after hours or when you're slammed?"
- "How are you handling [the specific gap you spotted] right now?"

Turn up the heat (gently)

- "Any idea roughly how many leads slip through in a week?"
- "What's one customer worth to you, on average?"
- "If you could wave a wand and fix one thing about how leads come in, what would it be?"

WHY THAT LAST SET MATTERS

When they say "a customer's worth two grand" and "I probably lose a few a week," they just did your ROI math for you. Now your price sounds cheap next to their own numbers. You didn't sell, they did.

02 Present the fix (short)

Now, and only now, you talk. Keep it tight and tie every word back to what they just told you. This is not a feature list. It's "here's how I solve the exact thing you just described."

THE FRAME

"So based on what you're telling me, the main thing is [their words, their problem]. Here's what I'd do: [the fix, in one or two plain sentences]. The point is you stop [losing the thing they're losing], which if your numbers are right is [roughly what it's costing them]. Make sense?"

Rules for the pitch

- Use their language. Repeat the exact words they used for their problem. It proves you listened.
- Sell the outcome, not the tech. They don't care how it works. They care that the phone stops leaking money.
- Then shut up. After you present, stop talking. Let them react. The silence is uncomfortable, don't fill it.

03 Handling objections, part one

Objections aren't rejection. They're the customer telling you what's between them and yes. Handle them calm and curious, never defensive.

"It's too expensive."

YOU SAY

"Fair. Let me ask, expensive compared to what? Because if you're losing [X leads a week] worth [Y each], this pays for itself pretty fast. But I want to make sure it actually fits, what number were you expecting?"

Reframe cost against what they lose by doing nothing. Then get their actual budget so you know what you're working with.

"Let me think about it."

YOU SAY

"Totally fair, it's your money and your business. Just so I know I explained it right, what's the main thing you want to think through? Sometimes it's a real concern I can clear up right now."

"Let me think about it" usually hides a real objection. This surfaces it instead of letting the deal quietly die.

"Does this actually work?"

YOU SAY

"Great question, you should be skeptical, there's a lot of hype out there. [Reference a real result / your case study]. And that's exactly why I structure it so [you're protected, e.g. deposit + clear scope]. Would seeing [proof / a demo] help?"

FILL THIS IN

That "does it work" answer NEEDS your real proof. Your first client, a result you got, a live demo. Until you have a case study, lean on a demo and honesty: "you'd be an early client, which is why the price reflects that." Drop your real story in here the second you have one.

04 Handling objections, part two

"I already have a guy / an agency."

YOU SAY

"Nice, glad you've got someone. Out of curiosity, are they handling [the specific gap]? A lot of the time the website guy isn't touching [the thing you do]. If they've got it covered, great. If there's a gap, that's where I come in."

"I need to talk to my [partner / spouse]."

YOU SAY

"Makes sense, big decisions should have both of you on board. What do you think they'll want to know? Let's make sure you've got the answers so it's an easy conversation. Should we get them on a quick call together?"

"Just send me some info / email me."

YOU SAY

"Happy to. Quick thing though, generic info won't tell you much. Let me put together something specific to [business] so it's actually useful. I'll send it over and we lock 10 minutes to walk through it, that way you're not just reading a PDF alone. Sound good?"

"Send me info" is often a polite brush-off. Tie the info to a scheduled next step or it disappears into their inbox forever.

THE UNIVERSAL MOVE

For almost any objection: acknowledge it ("fair," "makes sense"), ask a question to understand it, then address the real thing underneath. Never argue. Never get defensive. Calm curiosity closes more than any slick line.

05 Close on a next step

Never end a call with "let me know." That's where deals go to die. Always leave with a concrete next action and a time attached to it.

The soft close

YOU SAY

"So here's what I'm thinking, sounds like this is worth doing. I'll send over a simple proposal today with scope and price. If it looks good, we grab a deposit and I get started this week. Want me to send it?"

The assumptive close

YOU SAY

"Cool, I think this is a great fit. To get you on the calendar I take [50%] up front and start [timeframe]. I'll send the agreement and payment link right after this, sound good?"

Locking it down

- Get the deposit fast. The deal isn't real until money moves. Send the link while it's hot.
- Confirm the next step in writing. Right after the call, text or email a recap and what happens next.
- If it's a no, get the why. "No worries, mind if I ask what tipped it?" That answer makes your next call better.

ONE LINE TO REMEMBER

Every call ends with a scheduled next action. Proposal by [day], call to review [day], deposit by [day].
Momentum dies in vagueness. Kill the vagueness.
